SHELTON STATE COMMUNITY COLLEGE TAKES LEAD IN HISTORICAL ARCHAEOLOGICAL DIGS

Helping preserve a city's historical past is not the usual mission of a community college. However, for Shelton State Community College, located in the heart of Alabama, a state known for home and buildings built before the Civil War, preservation is a way of life and a natural tie-in to education.

Over the past three years, Shelton State has been involved in several local archaeological digs through the efforts of the college's assistant dean, Bruce Bizzoco. Bizzoco, who also teaches anthropology for Shelton State, has volunteered his summers over the past few years to work on several projects for the city of Tuscaloosa.

In 1988, Bizzoco teamed up with the archaeologists from the University of Alabama to excavate the former First State Bank site which was built in downtown Tuscaloosa in the 1820's. Students and local citizens volunteered to help with the dig, and the project evolved into a total community effort. The result of this first dig was an educational and cultural attraction for the city which already boasts a number of antebellum homes and buildings.

In 1989, a second excavation project began, this time the location was Capitol Park in Tuscaloosa, the site of Alabama's first Capitol which was located there from 1826-1846. This dig was also undertaken as a community project between Shelton State, the University of Alabama, the city of Tuscaloosa, the Tuscaloosa County Preservation Society, the Heritage Commission of Tuscaloosa County, and the Thrift Foundation. The first phase, which was completed that year, uncovered small patches of land in the park which were, in fact, the location of the Capitol's foundation boundaries.

During the summer of 1990, the dig continued. Outlines of the foundations of the south wing of the building outside the mound area were exposed.

This summer, 936 cubic yards of earth were moved, and the foundations of the state's former Capitol were exposed. The site was excavated to 2 1/2 feet below the actual floor level of the former Capitol. The interior walls showed the stone foundation, topped by brickwork above the floor line. Above the brickwork is where walls would have been plastered.

The Tuscaloosa City Council recently appointed a 10-person board to oversee the park's development as a tourist attraction. A grand unveiling of the project is already being planned for next spring.
